

The Approval Pack

The client approval message and the white-label monthly report that ended our revision email hell.

We run content for multiple client brands at my agency. Approvals used to be our biggest margin leak: batches dying in inboxes, "one quick change" threads with nine replies, posts missing their dates while we waited. The two templates in this pack are what fixed it. Our average approval turnaround went from most of a week to about a day, and both templates are copy-paste.

Landon, Cosmic Arc Media

1 The Approval Message

Send this with every content batch. Email, text, or Slack, the words are the same:

Hi [Name],

[Month]'s content batch is ready: [N] posts, all in one place.

Review everything here: [LINK]

Two things so nothing misses its date:

1. Approve or leave a note on any post right on that page. No login, takes about 3 minutes.
2. If I have not heard back by [DAY, 48 to 72 hours out], I will schedule everything as planned so your calendar stays full. Anything you flag gets fixed in one revision round before it posts.

[Your name]

The 4 rules that make it work

1. One link, never attachments. The moment content arrives as 14 files in an email, you have guaranteed yourself a scavenger-hunt review. Everything lives at one URL.
2. A default-approve deadline, stated kindly and enforced always. "If I have not heard back by Thursday, it ships." This is the single biggest fix. Calendars die waiting for a reply that was never coming, and clients respect the system more, not less.
3. One revision round per batch, said up front. Batch every note into one pass. The alternative is revision ping-pong, and ping-pong is where your margin goes to die.
4. One surface for feedback. Notes go on the review page, not split across a text, two emails, and a phone call. If a client sends feedback elsewhere, paste it onto the review page yourself and confirm there. Train the habit gently.

2 The scope-protecting revision language

Put this line in your proposal, your onboarding doc, and your monthly report footer. It reads as organized, not defensive:

Each monthly batch includes one revision round. Additional rounds are billed at [$X] or come out of the following month's post count, whichever you prefer.

Why it matters: you are not charging for revisions, you are pricing unlimited indecision. Clients who know the rule give better notes the first time. The ones who would have cost you your margin now pay for the privilege or self-correct. Either way you win.

3 The White-Label Monthly Report

One page. Clients do not read three-page reports, and the report's real job is renewals: proof of work, proof of thinking, and one clear ask. Here is the template:

[CLIENT LOGO] Content Report: [Month]

1. PUBLISHED THIS MONTH

[N] pieces live: [N] short clips, [N] text posts, [N] graphics, [N] long-form. (One line, platform breakdown.)

2. TOP 3 POSTS

Screenshot of each, one metric each (views, saves, or replies), and one line on WHY it worked. The why-line is what makes you look like a strategist instead of a scheduler.

3. WHAT WE LEARNED, AND NEXT MONTH'S PLAN

Three bullets max. "Story-driven clips beat talking-head clips 3 to 1, so March leads with stories."

4. ONE ASK

Exactly one thing you need from them: a recording date, a topic approval, an asset. One ask gets answered. Five asks get ignored.

Why one page wins

- It gets read. A read report renews retainers. An unread PDF renews nothing.
- Section 2's "why it worked" lines compound: after three months the client can see a strategy, not a feed.
- Section 4 keeps the relationship moving without a meeting.

The honest pitch, one paragraph: both of these templates work exactly as written with whatever tools you use today. They are also built into my software. VidFlow generates the no-login approval link automatically for every content batch (approve or comment per post, default-approve deadlines and all) and produces the white-label monthly report for each client brand. It is the system we built to run our own agency. We are onboarding in waves at vidflow.io, and you are on the list.